A Surprise That Almost Went Wrong

Last Friday was my best friend Olivia's fifteenth birthday. I wanted to do something special for her because she had been feeling a bit sad recently. Her family had moved to a new house on the other side of town, and she really missed living close to her friends.

Together with three classmates, I decided to organise a surprise birthday party at my house. We invited ten people, ordered some pizzas and bought decorations. My mum offered to make Olivia's favourite chocolate cake.

The biggest problem was keeping everything a secret. Olivia and I usually text each other several times a day, so it was difficult not to tell her about our plans. I told her we were going to spend Friday evening watching a film at my house.

On Friday afternoon, everything seemed to be going perfectly. The decorations were ready, the cake was in the fridge, and our friends were arriving one by one. However, just twenty minutes before Olivia was supposed to come, I received a message from her. She said she wasn't feeling well and wanted to stay at home.

I immediately called her, but she didn't answer. I was really worried that our surprise would be ruined. Luckily, my friend Jake had an idea. He suggested telling Olivia that I needed her help with an important school project.

At first, I wasn't sure it would work, but we decided to try. I sent Olivia another message, explaining that I had forgotten about a presentation we had to prepare together. I asked if she could come over for just half an hour.

To my surprise, she agreed.

When Olivia finally arrived, we turned off the lights and waited quietly in the living room. As soon as she opened the door, everyone shouted, "Surprise!"

Olivia looked completely shocked. For a moment, she couldn't say anything. Then she started laughing and almost cried.

Later that evening, she told me it was the best birthday she had ever had. She said that although she lived further away now, the party had reminded her that her friends would always be there for her.

I was exhausted by the end of the evening, but seeing Olivia so happy made all the effort worthwhile.
